Can the EU Stand Up to Trump’s “Deal of the Century”?

by Michelle Pace and Haim Yacobi

Reacting to President Trump’s proposed “vision” for the decades-long Israeli-Palestinian conflict, EU High Representative Josep Borrell made clear that the initiative departs from internationally agreed parameters and the EU therefore opposes “the deal”. The statement, however, was issued on an individual basis since EU declarations on behalf of all member states require unanimity. As expected, agreement among member states was lacking, preventing the issuance of an EU wide declaration.

EU member states are indeed divided on Trump’s “deal of the century”. For post-Brexit UK, British Foreign Secretary Dominic Raab, completely disregarded the worrying legal implications of the plan, describing the initiative as a “serious proposal”, and reiterated the British government’s position that the plan “could prove a positive step forwards”. In a similar fashion, Hungary, ignored the EU’s position and publicly supported the Trump proposal, describing it as “suitable for creating peace”.

Michelle Pace is Professor in Global Studies at Roskilde University. Haim Yacobi is Professor of Development Planning at the Bartlett Development Planning Unit, University College London. The authors wish to thank Dr Ziad Abu Mustafa and Dr Manal Massalha for their assistance in conducting interviews in Gaza (Ziad) and for collating international organizations’ reports (Manal) for the purpose of their Wellcome Trust project which forms the basis for this piece.
On the other hand, Sweden’s Foreign Minister Ann Linde reiterated the EU’s traditional support for a negotiated two-state solution, firmly anchored in international law, with Jerusalem as the capital of both states. Similar reactions from France emphasised the need for the two-state formula which is “in accordance with international law and within the framework of internationally agreed parameters”.

Aside from statements, what has been lacking is a concrete realisation that this is actually an opportune moment for the EU to move from rhetoric to action, seeking to make a difference and one that sticks.

Taking cues from the process that lead to the Iran nuclear deal, the EU should appreciate that one of its key foreign policy instruments is subtle diplomacy. No one doubts that the preliminary engagements during the 1990s and up until 2005 helped forge the Iran nuclear deal, ultimately reached in 2015.

On Israel/Palestine a number of global powers are included in the Middle East Quartet, established in 2002, and consisting of the UN, the EU, the US and Russia. But there has been no response from the Quartet to Trump’s “plan”. Instead, the separate parties issued their own respective statements.

Apart from the EU’s response, Russia deemed the US proposal as not in compliance with UN Security Council (UNSC) resolutions, in effect agreeing with Josep Borrell. On 4 February, the UNSC issued a draft resolution condemning Israel’s plan to annex its settlements in the West Bank and criticized Trump’s pro-Israel proposal. The US administration, placed heavy pressure on UNSC states, succeeding to have the resolution withdrawn one week later.

We have been in this situation many times before. Peace proposals that do not seriously engage with Israel’s domination and settler colonial enterprise have been advanced on numerous occasions – but things on the ground have only gotten worse, much worse. Not only have illegal settlements increased exponentially, Palestinian homes demolished and infrastructure destroyed, but the daily violence against Palestinians and the aggressive attacks... on the civilian population in Gaza have continued unabated.

What the EU neglects to mention and act upon is Israel’s forms of “slow violence”, defined by Rob Nixon as that which “occurs gradually and out of sight, a violence of delayed destruction that is dispersed across time and space, an attritional violence that is typically not viewed as violence at all”.8 Nixon contests conventional wisdoms regarding what counts as violence, alerting us to refocus our attention so as to make slow violence more visible.

In our current research on violence, power and health in Gaza – supported by the Wellcome Trust – we explore violence as a structural mechanism through which infrastructure, population and the environment itself are eroded and ultimately destroyed. We focus on how slow violence affects the daily life of Gazans’, described somberly by one of our interviewees as the “not yet arrived death”.

Our findings are confirmed by reports highlighting how basic conditions (electricity, clean water, sewage system, adequate housing etc.) are absent in the Gaza Strip. More than 96 per cent of groundwater is unfit for human consumption, and the forecast is that the damage will become irreversible soon.

Gaza’s beaches are polluted by more than a hundred million litres of raw sewage flowing into the sea every day. Zeid Ra'ad al-Hussein, the UN’s High Commissioner for Human Rights, described the situation as a “toxic slum”, a ghetto of 1.9 million residents (50 per cent under the age of 18) living in one of the most densely-populated places on earth.9 Now that the COVID-19 global crisis has reached Gaza this situation will be further aggravated.10

The EU needs to focus on these gradual forms of deadly attrition that have been destroying food sources, leading to malnutrition and the lethal zones left with toxicities after three wars (2008/9, 2012 and 2014). Not to mention the devastating effects of the siege imposed on Gazans’ since 2007, leading to high levels of cancer patients, amputated bodies and still births. The World Health Organization reports underlying determinants of health, including 10.8 per cent stunting in children under 5 years.11

OCHA reports significant increases in unarmed Palestinian casualties, the use of live-ammunition and the impact of tear gas canisters used by Israeli soldiers. The excessive use of force, including the specific targeting of knees by Israeli snipers during the Great March of Return protests in Gaza, as well as the exposure of children to such levels of violence should not only raise alarm bells but lead to urgent calls for international sanctions.

Silence from the EU on the impact of slow violence and its divided and inconsequential response to Trump’s “vision” are highly problematic. What the EU truly needs to draw attention to is that underlying all these actions are violations of its very own norms.

Article 2 of the EU-Israeli Association Agreement imposes binding obligations on the parties to observe human rights and democratic principles: if Israel violates international human rights law, the EU would be failing its legal obligations under this international agreement.

What has been lost in the midst of all the uproar in reactions to Trump’s “deal” is the EU’s disappearing integrity when it comes to respecting its very own norms. Ironically, it is the EU’s own differentiation policy that allows it to act, albeit with limitations.

So what can the EU do? In the face of US pressure and internal EU divisions, is there anything the EU can learn from Trump’s withdrawal from the Iran nuclear deal?

On the latter, Europe found itself in a bind: while Iran wanted Europe to maintain the deal, the US wanted the Europeans to abandon it. European leaders ignored US pressure and pledged to uphold the pact (at least rhetorically), defining the Iran nuclear deal as instrumental to European interests and thereby worthy of protection. While EU efforts have been far from successful, the crisis has renewed EU efforts to prioritise strategic autonomy from the US, a dynamic that is likely to persist in the future. Palestine should figure as another area of increased EU efforts to foster an autonomous policy from the US.

The EU has shown innovative means of sustaining its commitments on Palestine in the past. In June 2006, it established the Temporary International Mechanism, to provide assistance directly to the Palestinian people, after it was pressured by the US and Israel to boycott the democratically elected Hamas-led government.

---

The EU therefore needs to be a smart power. It has two important instruments at its disposal that it can use wisely: diplomacy and economics.

First, EU foreign policy cannot continue to be decided by unanimity. This blocks the EU from “acting” forcefully and persuasively on the global scene. The EU needs three core member states to navigate the ship through subtle diplomacy – Sweden, France and Germany preferably.

Secondly, Israel needs to hear loud and clear that, if it does not stop violating the EU’s own norms, its economic agreements (an Association Agreement from 1995 and an Action Plan from 2004) with its main trading partner will be made obsolete.

Such benchmarks and parameters need to be formulated in strong and clear language in the shape of a new EU plan. This plan should specify that political, economic and cultural/social relations with the world’s largest trading bloc will be severely affected if Israel does not abide by the EU’s own normative commitments. Such steps will take political courage but will ultimately help consolidate EU credibility and coherence as a humanitarian power – one that respects and promotes its very own foundational norms.

23 March 2020

Can the EU Stand Up to Trump’s “Deal of the Century”?

Istituto Affari Internazionali (IAI)
The Istituto Affari Internazionali (IAI) is a private, independent non-profit think tank, founded in 1965 on the initiative of Altiero Spinelli. IAI seeks to promote awareness of international politics and to contribute to the advancement of European integration and multilateral cooperation. Its focus embraces topics of strategic relevance such as European integration, security and defence, international economics and global governance, energy, climate and Italian foreign policy; as well as the dynamics of cooperation and conflict in key geographical regions such as the Mediterranean and Middle East, Asia, Eurasia, Africa and the Americas. IAI publishes an English-language quarterly (The International Spectator), an online webzine (Affarinternazionali), three book series (Global Politics and Security, Quaderni IAI and IAI Research Studies) and some papers’ series related to IAI research projects (Documenti IAI, IAI Papers, etc.).

Via Angelo Brunetti, 9 - I-00186 Rome, Italy
T +39 06 3224360
F + 39 06 3224363
iai@iai.it
www.iai.it

Latest IAI COMMENTARIES

Director: Andrea Dessi (a.dessi@iai.it)

20 | 10  Michelle Pace and Haim Yacobi, Can the EU Stand Up to Trump’s “Deal of the Century”?

20 | 09  Nathalie Tocci, International Order and the European Project in Times of COVID19

20 | 08  Nicoletta Pirozzi, COVID-19 Emergency: Europe Needs a Vaccine

20 | 07  Simona Autolitano, A Europe Fit for the Digital Age: The Quest for Cybersecurity Unpacked

20 | 06  Francesca Ghiretti, The Coronavirus and Freedom of Expression in China: Not so Fast

20 | 05  Giulia Cretti, Human Trafficking in the Thai Fishing Industry: A Call to Action for EU and US Importers

20 | 04  Mattia Giampaolo, General Haftar and the Risks of Authoritarian “Stability” in Libya

20 | 03  Federica Gasbarro, Climate Activism and the Fridays for Future Movement: From Campaigning in Italy to the UN General Assembly

20 | 02  Luca Barana, A Geopolitical Commission in Africa: Streamlining Strategic Thinking on Trade and Cooperation

20 | 01  Luca Bergamaschi, There Is No Green Deal without a Just Transition